

Historical Context: 2026 Is Outperforming the Average Midterm Year

Midterm election years have historically been more volatile than other years, and they've historically delivered weaker returns. This year has followed a very different path. The S&P 500 has gained nearly +12% year-to-date. For comparison, the average midterm year is historically flat at the same point, while the average non-midterm year is up nearly +9%. This year has outperformed not only the typical midterm year but also the average non-midterm year. The chart below compares the S&P 500's year-to-date price return against the average return path of midterm and non-midterm years since 1978, with each year indexed to 100 at the start of the year.

The explanation for the historical midterm pattern is that these years carry an unusual amount of policy uncertainty around future taxes, spending plans, and regulatory changes. Investors generally dislike unresolved questions. Markets have been volatile this year, but the source has been geopolitical and macroeconomic rather than electoral. The S&P 500 fell -5% in Q1 before rebounding more than +20%. Geopolitical tensions have contributed to sharp moves in oil prices, long-term Treasury yields have climbed to multi-decade highs, and uncertainty around the Federal Reserve's policy has repeatedly shifted the outlook for interest rates. The volatility midterm years are known for has appeared, but the election calendar hasn't been the cause, and the weak returns haven't followed either.

The chart also shows markets have historically traded higher once the election passes and attention returns to earnings and economic growth. Those fundamentals have driven the market this year. Strong corporate earnings have helped support the stock market's valuation. Artificial intelligence investment has fueled spending on data centers, computer chips, software, and power infrastructure, supporting both company profits and broader economic growth. The economy has also continued to expand, supported by steady consumer spending and business investment. None of these drivers depend on an election outcome. Corporate earnings, interest rates, and consumer demand operate on their own timelines.

This year's divergence from the historical midterm pattern is a useful reminder of the limits of market averages. An investor could have entered 2026 knowing that midterm years have historically produced more volatility and weaker returns. Expecting a difficult market would have been reasonable. The mistake would have been treating that historical average as a return forecast. Historical patterns are useful because they show what markets have tended to do under similar circumstances. They are less useful when the average becomes a prediction for a single year. The takeaway: Use history as context for what might happen along the way, but don't use it as a forecast of where you'll end up.

Figure 1 – S&P 500 Price Return Midterm Election & Non-Midterm Election Years

Source: S&P Global. Midterm years represent the average weekly indexed path of all midterm election years beginning with 1978. Non-midterm years represent the average of all remaining calendar years. Each calendar year is indexed to 100 at the start of the year. 2026 is shown separately through week 36. The S&P 500 is an unmanaged index that cannot be invested in directly. Past performance is not indicative of future results, and this information is provided for informational purposes only and should not be construed as investment advice or a recommendation to buy or sell any security. Data as of 9/11/2026.

Important Disclosures

PUREfi Wealth, LLC ("PUREfi") is a registered investment adviser with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Any reference to the terms "registered investment adviser" or "registered" does not imply that PUREfi or any person associated with PUREfi has achieved a certain level of skill or training. A copy of PUREfi's current written disclosure statement discussing our advisory services and fees is available for your review upon request.

The information provided is for informational purposes only and advisers should determine for themselves whether a particular service or product is suitable for their clients' investment needs.

The information contained herein should not be construed as an attempt to sell or solicit any products or services of PUREfi or any investment strategy, nor should it be construed as legal, accounting, tax or other professional advice. This material is proprietary and may not be reproduced, transferred, modified or distributed in any form without prior written permission from PUREfi. PUREfi reserves the right, at any time and without notice, to amend, or cease publication of the information contained herein.

Certain information contained herein has been obtained from third-party sources and has not been independently verified. It is made available on an "as is" basis without warranty. Any strategies or investment programs described in this presentation are provided for educational purposes only and are not necessarily indicative of securities offered for sale or private placement offerings available to any investor. The views expressed in the referenced materials are subject to change based on market and other conditions. This document contains certain statements that may be deemed forward-looking statements. Please note that any such statements are not guarantees of any future performance; actual results or developments may differ materially from those projected. Any projections, market outlooks, or estimates are based upon certain assumptions and should not be construed as indicative of actual events that will occur.

Historical performance results for investment indices and/or product benchmarks have been provided for general comparison purposes only, and do not include the charges that might be incurred in an actual portfolio, such as transaction and/or custodial charges, investment management fees, or the impact of taxes, the incurrence of which would have the effect of decreasing historical performance results.